Using they/them pronouns and wearing a binder on days when I feel more gender-neutral helps me feel comfortable! As someone with a large chest, it can be very distressing at times.

“

After telling my current partner about my sexual identity, it was the first time in my life where someone has called me beautiful and strong, and I believed it.

Wonderful
Beautiful
Amazing

My high school was very small and conservative. I was out as gay but I never really flaunted it because I still never felt 100% safe. I went to my first (and only) school party and I was so worried about being called a slut or something. However, one of the girls was really sweet to me and kept trying to get me to hang with these boys so I just casually dropped that I was very much not into them and she was shocked. She asked who knew and I honestly didn't know, but she asked if she could ask her friend if she knew and her friend assured her that everyone knew. And everyone did know but they didn't care because they knew it didn't define me and I ended up having a great time.

“

When I came out to my best friend and was worried about not fitting into a “label,” and them telling me that populating the umbrella term “queer” is just as valid!
